Anglican Opinion on Prohibition.

(Saturday Night.)

The statement on prohibition recently made by Rev. Dr. Bidwell, Anglican Bishop of Kingston, is a clear indication that prohibition has failed to commend itself to many men who rank among the sanest, soberest, and most honorable members of the community.

"Our church is not committed to prohibition to the exclusion of every other method of abolishing drunkenness and promoting real temperance," said Bishop Bidwell. "Nor can it," he added, "ever subscribe to the doctrine that the use of wine as a beverage is in itself wrong. To do so would be to contradict its own most sacred teaching and practice, in the blessed sacrament, not to speak of the imputation on Him who instituted that sacrament. In determining, therefore, how to vote in the coming referendum, it will be well to have these considerations in mind."

Bishop Bidwell made it clear that while opposed to the saloon and the bar, the best Anglican thought was not convinced that absolute prohibition of alcoholic liquors in any form was the best means of combating intemperance. "Everybody knows," he said, "that there is a widespread underground traffic going on under the worst possible conditions."

The gist of the Anglican conclusion seems to be that while temperance is a moral obligation, total abstinence is not. The out-and-out prohibitionists ignore the distinction between use and abuse. They seem to have abandoned any idea of tackling or combating the abuse of liquor. One speaker at the recent convention of the Dominion Alliance went so far as to say that the purpose of prohibition was not to end drunkenness, since experience had shown this to be impossible.

The real purpose, it would appear, is to make the use of liquor under any circumstances a moral crime; and to give this theory the effect of law. The Anglican attitude, as stated by Bishop Bidwell, discerns in this extremism an imputation against the Founder of Christianity, as well as an attempt to perpetuate an unenforceable statute of no moral validity.
